3. Major Field(s) of Scholarly or Professional Interest: Immigrant, Refugee Mental Health, Intersectionality, Critical Theory, Qualitative Research, Community-Based Participatory Action Research, Public Policy, Social Justice, Health and Health Care Inequities.

Building on my dissertation work, my program of research focuses on social and structural inequities experienced by under-served population groups including groups negatively affected by displacement, i.e., refugees as well as other groups that experience structural vulnerabilities due to their age, sex/gender, ethnicity/race, class/poverty and their mental health status. As a result of this work, my program of research and scholarship addresses public policy and the mental health of under-served communities. I am particularly interested in health care service approaches which address systemic inequities as a result of racism, classism, ableism, and sexism and which perpetuate social exclusion and discrimination. It is my strong belief that research which seeks to understand these complex intersections across health care policy, services and practice will promote mental health and wellbeing of communities. I have an interest in post-colonial and intersectionality theory, which examine how “race,” class, and gender are intertwined in historical processes which perpetuate the subordination of non-dominant groups, in particular women, men, and sexual minorities who are racialized. I situate my scholarship within critical theoretical approaches. These approaches give voice to non-dominant narratives, which address inequities in health and health care services.

My research and community practice focus strongly on mental health and the well-being of under-served communities. I believe that health status is inseparable from broader social, economic, and political processes. In my doctoral work, I conducted extensive ethnographic field research and applied a standpoint feminist approach in knowledge production. Standpoint methods in particular construct knowledge from the standpoint of women and their everyday lives and experiences. Extending from my doctoral research I have applied an intersectional analysis to gender-based policy analysis across ongoing research projects.

Because many under-served groups, including immigrant, refugee and ethno-cultural racialized groups, have experienced trauma through colonization and ongoing neo-colonial practices, it is paramount that research is aimed at building healthy public policy and practice which promote social justice. Importantly, social justice must be examined beyond the distribution of resources to include the recognition of differences and inclusion of voice of the public who represent non-dominant groups in society, if we are to move toward greater equity in health care services, policies, and systems.
